

something goes wrong early in the life of your telescope (most manufacturers' warranties are about one year).

Optical Cleaning

When it comes to cleaning telescope optics, SCT users are, as in collimation, lucky. This is because we normally only have one optical surface to clean, the inner side of the corrector plate. Newtonian owners, in contrast, must deal with two optical elements. Our correctors are also much less likely to be scratched by wrong-headed cleaning than are the extremely delicate first-surface mirrors of a Newtonian reflecting telescope. But cleaning any optical device is not something to be done lightly. In fact, my usual advice to novices when it comes to cleaning is: "don't." When cleaning any optical surface the fact is a new user is much more likely to do more harm than good. Does that mean you should never clean your corrector? No. If it is really dirty and in need of cleaning, you can proceed. But many novices obsess about cleanliness of their SCTs.

The truth is, no matter what you do, the corrector plate of your telescope will always have some dust on it. This is inevitable if you actually use your telescope and it will not harm a thing. Don't worry about it, and don't be tempted to over-clean. A speck of dust will do much less harm than a big scratch you've left on the lens by mistake during one cleaning too many. This really can't be overemphasized: leave your corrector alone unless it's really, really dirty. It would do many new amateurs good to see how dirty the optics of professional telescopes are allowed to become before they are cleaned.

But the time will eventually come when the SCT or MCT will need a gentle corrector cleaning. In addition to a little dust, it may have accumulated a finger print smudge or two. Or some unidentifiable gunk was deposited on it at that last star party. If it really is obviously dirty, there's no denying it's lens-cleaning time. What's the secret to preserving your beautiful corrector lens and getting it nice and clean? The secret is to treat your corrector just as you would a fine camera lens - which is really what it is. It is precisely shaped and manufactured for optimum performance. You should treat it with due respect, but cleaning your corrector needn't be a frightening prospect. I'm just attempting to impress upon you the delicate nature of all optics and the need for exercising extreme care when you're cleaning them.

Corrector Cleaning

Before outlining the proper procedure for cleaning optics, let's discuss for a moment how you can keep your optics clean enough so as to minimize the need for cleaning. You should always keep your corrector lens cap in place when the scope is not being used. Even when the scope is outside cooling down prior to use, it's a good idea to keep the cover on. I also feel that storing the telescope in a case or bin also tends to minimize contamination. That SCT may look pretty assembled on its tripod in your living room, but a case of some kind will keep it both cleaner and safer. It's also wise to keep the rear port of the telescope closed at all times. Dust, bugs and other contaminants can enter your OTA, and removing these foreign substances is a major job.

A major source of contamination for your corrector plate is dew. A wet corrector can cause any dust present to adhere to the lens. It can also promote the growth of fungi. Keeping dew from adding to your cleanliness problems is simple enough, though. If you live in an environment where heavy dew formation is likely, you'll have to equip yourself with dew fighting tools and keep your corrector dry if you're going to do much observing at all. What if, however, in spite of your best efforts, your corrector is soaked in dew by the end of the evening? This isn't a disaster as long as you keep the lens cap off. Never, and I do mean never, cap any dew-covered surface. If you do, you're likely to promote fungal growth as the capped lens slowly dries. The dew may also leave behind a deposit of some kind. If your location is humid, the scope may never dry completely. Remove the dew with a heater gun before capping the telescope aperture or move the CAT inside and let it dry naturally outside its case. To loosen the cluster of dust collection, point the corrector end down. Once the lens is completely dry, you can cover the corrector and return the SCT to its case as normal.

Cleaning Procedure

Step one in cleaning is to deal with the easy stuff first, the loose accumulation of dust lying on the corrector's
