

that policy formation is a central theme of management, an explicit cultural comparison of some of the recognised trends would surely have been possible.

Finally, while the rich diversity of what constitutes research in education comes through strongly, this reviewer felt at sea several times over the other two nouns of the title. Whose practice is being considered — the teacher's or the administrator's? Is policy over once the decision at the macro-level is taken? Moreover, as one of the contributors makes clear, education is just one aspect of social policy. Why then no comparative viewpoint from health, social work, etc.?

THE ART OF EDUCATIONAL EVALUATION

Elliot W. Eisner (The Falmer Press, 1985), pp. viii and 275, £14.95 and £8.50.

SALLY BROWN

In making his important and influential contributions to education, Elliot Eisner always says sensible things very eloquently. This book consists of 15 of his articles published between 1967 and 1984. The collection illustrates the ideas which have permeated his writing on the curriculum and educational evaluation over that period and gives us what Philip Taylor in the preface describes as "a blend of imaginative challenges to the view of education as a science and lucid expositions of education as a human endeavour".

Eisner starts by looking back at some of the efforts, made in the 1920s, to apply scientific principles to the school curriculum; he sees the associated ideas as formulated in the same rational, scientific spirit that later would characterize the systematic work of Bloom, Goodlad and Tyler on objectives, the curriculum and evaluation. His analysis of the scientific approach points to its tendency "to collapse under its own weight" of hundreds of objectives and "to understate the importance of values as a guide . . . in making curriculum decisions".

This preliminary analysis heralds his discussions on educational objectives. He argues that not only are the outcomes of education far too numerous to be encapsulated in a manageable set of behavioural (instructional) objectives, but also that in some (perhaps most) subject areas such specification is distorting and dangerous. This is particularly the case where novel and creative responses from students are called for and where the outcomes of instruction are not amenable to being reported by some "measurement". He argues that the sequence of rational curriculum planning, where the statement of instructional objectives precedes the formulation of curriculum activities, neither mirrors the ways in which teachers currently think about and develop their courses nor provides a good model for the "psychological conditions useful for constructing curriculums". In a constructive vein, he proposes that instructional objectives be supplemented by "expressive" objectives which reflect the

Foundations for Curriculum Development and Evaluation in Art Education George W. Hardiman, Theodore Zernich, 1981 The Art of Evaluation Tara J. Fenwick, James B. Parsons, Jim Parsons, 2000 The Art of Evaluation is essential reading for educators and prospective educators who are concerned about the critical role of evaluation in the learning process and want to know how to improve their own assessment approaches and enable learners to assume active meaningful roles in evaluating their own learning An instructor can know all there is to know about evaluation and still have a difficult time evaluating students well This book offers practical ways to plan evaluation and develop tools to record and report learner growth The underlying theme is that good evaluation involves the learner throughout the whole learning experience and is not simply a judgment by an instructor at the end of a course The book systematically reviews many aspects of learner evaluation from different perspectives and provides practical suggestions about how to conduct evaluation in different contexts to benefit all concerned This book is intended as an introduction to learner evaluation in various contexts of adult education We have attempted to address issues and provide examples that would fit the interests of students of adult education new college and university teachers trainers in business and government and consultants whose work involves learner evaluation Every educator works within a unique context of learners purposes structures and cultures Every reader therefore needs to be critical and selective when choosing among the materials offered in this book Some of it will suit you some may not fit your philosophy or your situation and some will need adaptation to be useful in your work
