

Summary 17.4-6

Standing Sound Waves and Musical Acoustics

Standing waves can be enclosed in a tube or pipe. A standing wave in a closed tube must have a displacement node on one end.

Boundary conditions are the same as for a standing wave on a string: nodes at the ends.

The nodes and antinodes of the pressure wave are interchanged with those of the displacement wave.

Tubes with Openings

Air columns closed at both ends are of limited interest unless you are inside the column. We are focusing more on columns with one end open.

Not surprisingly, the boundary condition at the end open to a column of air is not the same as the boundary condition at a closed end. The air pressure at the open end of a tube is constrained to match the atmospheric pressure of the surrounding air. So the open end of a tube must be a pressure node.
