

Notches, Rough Passageways and Smooth Joists

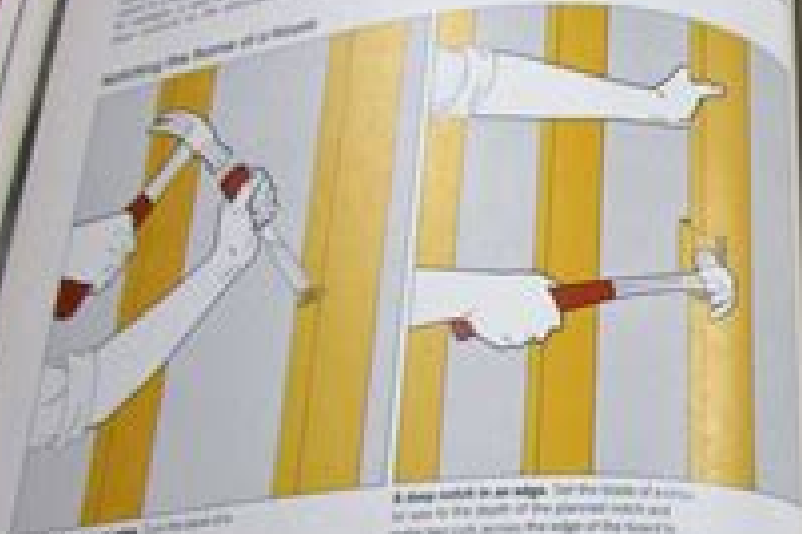

When you're working on a roof, you'll often find yourself needing to get into tight spaces. Notches, rough passageways, and smooth joists are the three main ways to get into these spaces. Each has its own advantages and disadvantages, and knowing when to use each is a key skill for any roofer.

Notches are the simplest way to get into a tight space. They are made by cutting a V-shaped hole in the wood. Notches are easy to make and can be used in a variety of situations. However, they can weaken the wood and are not always the best solution for larger openings.

Rough passageways are made by cutting a rectangular hole in the wood. They are more difficult to make than notches but provide a larger opening. Rough passageways are often used for larger openings, such as for a chimney or a vent.

Smooth joists are made by cutting a rectangular hole in the wood, then smoothing the edges. They are the most difficult to make but provide the largest and most secure opening. Smooth joists are often used for large openings, such as for a chimney or a vent.

Notching the corner of a board

Notching a corner of a board To make a notch in the corner of a board, use a hand saw to cut the corner off. Then use a hand plane to smooth the edges of the notch.

A deep notch in an edge For the inside of a corner, use the tip of the hand saw to cut a deep notch in the edge of the board. Then use a hand plane to smooth the edges of the notch.
