

Importance of nursing research and nursing continuing professional development

As an alumnus of the Southern Nursing Research Society (SNRS) Leadership Academy and planning committee member of the SNRS annual convention, I will share the benefits of aligning nursing research and nursing continuing professional development contact hours. Nursing continuing education, also conceptualized as nursing continuing professional development (NCPD), is essential for nurses to maintain licensure and certifications across all nursing specialties. One way nurses can obtain the contact hours needed to maintain licensure is by attending research society conventions. Conferences allow nurses to receive contact hours as they attend presentations, workshops, and symposia. Conventions support networking with peers across the globe and developing collegial relationships that foster collaborative research (Bodine et al., 2022). Conventions and webinars enable nurse research teams to meet with colleagues to develop, design and implement ongoing research across multi-site studies (Shirley et al., 2021). Our current interest in inclusivity features conventions restructured to meet the needs of multiple generations of learners, including shorter sessions, focus groups, and tailored peer discussions.

The mission of SNRS can be fostered through the framework of accreditation which, in addition to educational design, includes advancing nursing research through disseminating and utilizing research findings, facilitating the career development of nurses and nursing students as researchers, promoting nursing science, and enhancing communication among members. Long-term, 3–6 month surveys can inform future areas of focus for NCPD and identify gaps that inform new research pursuits.

The educational design process starts with identifying previous annual conference needs based on conference evaluations, stakeholder feedback, and public health trends. The planning teams focus on the needs of the attendees and tailor the content and speakers to meet the target audience's needs. The evolution of NCPD and conference planning has changed over the years and is in alignment with the measurable outcomes and unique strategic goals of organizations and associations. The learners can better articulate what they will take from the learning experience through quantifiable outcomes for the conventions. As an attendee at any conference, engaging and evaluating helps the planning team improve the event for learners and discover innovative ways to meet the needs of multiple generations. As leaders are working to meet various generations in the nursing workforce, we must become increasingly creative in engaging our learners through online and in-person learning activities. As nurses, we must also be aware of the entire team of learners and look beyond a nursing perspective as education relates to not only continuing education credit but also outcomes, strategic goal alignment, and performance in practice.

A great resource recently released from the American Nurses Credentialing Center's Research Council is The ANCC Multisite Research Playbook, can be used as an innovative and collaborative tool for organizations interested in conducting research across multiple locations and organizational entities (Shirley et al., 2021). This resource was created to foster research with a more significant societal impact through collaboration across organizations. The playbook also guides content experts. This resource helps organizations "to improve research capacity within organizations and assist organizations credentialled through the Magnet Recognition Program® meet criterion requirements. Lessons learned from these multi-site studies have been collated into this practical research playbook, creating a road map for nurse researchers at all levels and across all types of settings" (Shirley et al., 2021, p. 2). This resource will support the mission of SNRS to advance nursing research through collaborative research as we continually pull for resources in nursing research.
