experience to be enjoyed again and again. So the following will move through the spawning pattern with the fish and will start with the assumption that the pair is loose together in the breeding tank.

1. The moment the fish discover each other is a moment of transformation. There are almost instant expressions of mutual awareness. Fins and gills are spread wide, and the fish's colors become more and more brightened as you watch. It is fascinating to watch the usual horizontal barring or lack of any barring pattern of the female melt away to be replaced by a vertical barring pattern. This is a signal of her awareness of the male. They will swim side by side at this time in a trembling, pivoting kind of pattern. This will be interrupted from time to time, but will be repeated.

2. An increase in excitement then follows with the male becoming more and more aggressive, which results in his slapping at the female with his body and fins and making headlong lunges at her in an attempt to bite and nip. Usually the female is pretty adept at dodging these lunges and manages to keep away from real harm.

The Spawning

It's surprising to see how fast these fish can move when they have to.

3. The female will retreat from these advances, and when the male finds he has nothing to chase he will begin to build the nest in a select spot in the tank. However, if the female swims back into view he will take up the chase once more. When she is hidden from him again he will go back to nest building.

4. As the nest progresses and time goes on, the male will change tactics; his approach to the female will be more to lure her to the nest than to attack. He will swim for her, present a side view with fins and gills spread, and wag his body back and forth in an "S" pattern. He then will swim back towards the nest to Spawning begins with the male courting the female with great fin and constant activity in building the bubble nest. Photo by J. Hoffer.
