

CONSTITUTIVE MODELING OF CYCLIC PLASTICITY AND CREEP, USING AN INTERNAL TIME CONCEPT

O. WATANABE and S. N. ATLURI

Georgia Institute of Technology

Abstract—Using the concept of an internal time as related to plastic strains, a differential stress-strain relation for elastoplasticity is rederived, such that (i) the concept of a yield-surface is retained; (ii) the definitions of elastic and plastic processes are analogous to those in classical plasticity theory; and (iii) its computational implementation, via a "tangent-stiffness" finite element method and a "generalized-midpoint-radial-return" stress-integration algorithm, is simple and efficient. Also, using the concept of an internal time, as related to both the inelastic strains as well as the Newtonian time, a constitutive model for creep-plasticity interaction, is discussed. The problem of modeling experimental data for plasticity and creep, by the present analytical relations, as accurately as desired, is discussed. Numerical examples which illustrate the validity of the present relations are presented for the cases of cyclic plasticity and creep.

1. INTRODUCTION

The characterization of material behavior at elevated temperatures plays an important role in the design of structures such as in hot sections of modern jet engines and other power plants. The ASME Code [1974] defines acceptable levels of stress and strain in critical components of power plants operating at elevated temperatures. The severe mechanical environment may often cause these structures to operate near or beyond the yield limit of the material. Consequently, a unified theory of creep and plasticity, applicable to cyclic loading, is often desirable.

Typical constitutive relations for creep reported and used in literature include the modified strain hardening rule developed by researchers at the Oak Ridge National Lab (PUOH et al. [1972], CORUM et al. [1974]), dislocation models (LAGNEBORG [1971], GITTUS [1976]) based on metal physics, nonlinear viscoelasticity theory (BESSELING [1958]); and the kinematic hardening model (MALININ & KHADJINSKY [1972]) using an analogy to plasticity. However, recent efforts in material-constitutive-model development reveal a trend toward unifying creep and plasticity. Some experimental results (CORUM et al. [1974], JASKE et al. [1975]) have been reported concerning the interaction between creep and plasticity. These unifying theories may be roughly divided into the three categories of (i) potential theories, (ii) microphenomenological theories and (iii) nonlinear viscoplastic theories. Most studies employ these theories either individually or in combination. In the first category, one may cite the theories using time-dependent parameters (KRATOCHVIL & DILLON [1970]), the concept of kinematic hardening (KUJAWSKI & MROZ [1980]), micromechanical considerations (PONTER & LECKIE [1976]), and a combination of viscoplastic theory (CHABOCHE [1977]). The phenomenological theories (BODNER & PARTOM [1975], HART [1976], HART et al. [1976], MILLER [1976a, 1976b], KRAIG et al. [1978], LEE & ZAVERT [1978], ROBINSON [1978], BODNER et al. [1979], STOFFER & BODNER [1979]) employ certain internal variables to reflect the micromechanics of deformation, such as involving dislocations. Most of these theories assume that the plastic strains are also time-dependent, as are creep strains, and
