VARICOCELE IN SUBFERTILITY RESULTS OF TREATMENT

W. SILEY TULLOCH, F.R.C.S.E.

Surgeon, Urological Unit, Western General Hospital, Edinburgh

(Br Med J, pp. 1046-1048, August 6, 1988, reprinted with permission)

During recent years considerable interest has been directed to the subject of fertility in the male. It is becoming more fully appreciated that in the human marriage the male should be examined, and that such an examination should provide the examination of the female.

When a subfertile state is found, attention is focused on the aetiology and the treatment. Recognized aetiological factors are inflammatory conditions of the urethra, prostate, seminal vesicles, and epididymis; endocrine disturbances; the failure of testicular development; traumatic and other conditions. Much has been written about methods of treatment: vitamins, hormonal therapy, operative intervention for mechanical obstruction have all been recommended. These methods have their supporters and opponents, and there is considerable variation of opinion regarding the value of treatment.

During examination of subfertile males, and in some cases sterile males, it has been found that the incidence of varicocele is very high. The term "varicocele" may be defined as elongation, dilation, and tortuosity of the veins of the pampiniform plexus. It was observed in the physical examination of males who had a varicocele—for more common on the left side than the right—that the testis was sometimes smaller than normal and showed evidence of softening in varying degrees. Often the testis on the opposite side showed a tendency towards softening. In many cases seminal analysis of the male who had a varicocele demonstrated variation from moderate degrees of subfertility to gross depression of the quality of the seminal fluid, even in some cases to azoospermia.

Dr. J. K. Russell (1954), in a careful study of the relationship of varicocele to subfertility in the male, has no doubt that the incidence of varicocele is higher in men with poor-quality seminal fluid. His conclusion: "The purpose of this paper is not to plead for more active treatment (indeed, attention has been drawn to the dangers of active surgical treatment), but rather to challenge the traditional attitude that varicocele is an innocuous condition and to stress the need for more extensive investigation into the natural history of varicocele and the effect which it may have upon fertility."

It has been stated by such an authoritative worker in the field of subfertility as Hotchkiss (1984) that "the surgical correction of a varicocele is probably only effective as a prophylactic measure against damage which might occur with passing years. It is unlikely that the operation has other than cosmetic value in long-standing cases with small soft testes." The purpose of this communication is to stress the value of operative intervention, provided the correct operative technique is used.

It was considered that venous stasis could have two effects on the germinal epithelium:

The Lack of Nutrition of the Germinal Epithelium.—Because of venous stasis and congestion it seemed possible that the germinal epithelium was not receiving adequate nutrition and oxygenation. It is well known that spectra of nutrition to tissue can occur in other sites of the body where venous stasis commonly occurs.

The Effect of Temperature Balance.—For adequate maturation of spermatozoa a very delicate temperature balance in the testes must be maintained. It is likely that with venous stasis temperature balance is upset? From a nutritional point of view it is hard to explain how a male with unilateral varicocele would not produce an adequate specimen of seminal fluid from the other testis, and it seems more likely that the cause is an upset of temperature. Hotchkiss (1984) believes this to be the reason.

ILLUSTRATIVE CASE

Some years ago a male aged 27 reported for examination. On two occasions seminal examination confirmed azoospermia to be present. Physical examination showed that there
