

VICTORIAN/LATE NINETEENTH CENTURY LITERARY CRITICISM

The Victorian age in Britain brought about many significant changes in many aspects of life, including humanities, and more specifically, literature. Faster transportation was possible, due to the invention of faster steamboats and steam train and railway system. British colonies had encompassed many parts of the world and paved the way for the British Commonwealth. Life in Britain had turned both more metropolitan and cosmopolitan, and was closer to the current definition of modern life. Problems arose, of course, due to these changes. Farming areas were reduced, more people living in cities and working in factories, and the high number of unemployed citizens affected the rise in crime and decline in welfare. These problems became the main themes of the fiction, mainly novels, of the era, through the hands of Charles Dickens, Thomas Hardy, William Thackeray, and Benjamin Disraeli. This marked the rise of realism in the English literature.

The Victorian age also marked the beginning of different point views in treating literature. The era saw many changes and alternatives in literary criticism. In this class, each of the three critics chosen here represents a different attitude towards literature. Matthew Arnold discusses the pedagogic, moralistic, and disinterested study of poetry. Henry James sees fiction, especially the realistic novel, as the dominant genre of literature and proposes a variety of expressions and possibilities in its creative process. On the other hand, at the end of the Victorian era, Oscar Wilde adopts the famous "art for art's sake", denounces
