

Science can be thought of as containing themes and paradigms. Themes are areas of current research, while paradigms comprise the dominant tool sets and existing knowledge that are used by today's researchers. This map shows 776 major paradigms in science along with the dominant relationships between those paradigms. Paradigms are shown as circles; strong relationships between paradigms are indicated by the lines connecting the circles. The map was created by recursively clustering the 820,000 papers referenced most often in 2003. Clustering at each level was done using YoClust, a force-directed graph layout routine. These papers formed 53,800 clusters, 4,100 higher-level clusters, and finally the 776 paradigms. Although each paradigm contains, on average, 1,000 papers, some are larger and some are smaller, as shown by different sized circles on the map.

The ring-like structure that is formed by scientific paradigms is very robust. We find similar structures for different years, and for maps generated from scientific journals. "The Structure of Science", a galaxy map shown in the first iteration of Places & Spaces, is a map based on clustering of scientific journals, with superimposition of papers on the journal structure, whereas this map was generated directly from highly-cited papers. "The Structure of Science" shows current science in a disciplinary context, while this map can show the breadth of disciplines that contribute to single paradigms.

Because of the robust nature of the structure of science and its paradigms, we have placed our 776 scientific paradigms within a reference system containing 12 radial slices and 6 rings. This allows the position of each paradigm to be codified and available for lookup; for instance Fluid mechanics paradigms are in grid B3.

We have also calculated and displayed the vitality of each paradigm. Vitality is a measure of the speed at which a group of researchers reaches consensus about major improvements. Paradigms are constantly being improved, but it usually takes years to reach consensus about which improvements are major. The white circles represent communities where consensus is reached relatively slowly. This is a common phenomenon in the social sciences, ecological sciences, computer sciences, and mathematics disciplines. The red circles represent communities of researchers where consensus is reached relatively rapidly. This is more common in physics, chemistry, biochemistry, and many medical disciplines. Very dark circles (such as those in Autoethnology, D3-6) represent communities where consensus is reached extremely quickly.

The map of scientific paradigms and its reference system can be used for multiple purposes. Countries, industries, companies, universities, and individual researchers can all locate themselves within the map, either as single points, or as a specific collection of paradigms. Various metrics, such as vitality, can be overlaid on this reference system to highlight specific impacts. Science education and personal discovery can also be enhanced by linking stories and facts to the map that highlight scientific history, current advances and relationships between scientific paradigms.
