

Fuji T-1A

Once the Japanese aircraft industry had been cleared to begin production again in 1955, the government awarded a number of substantial contracts to Fuji with the aim of producing indigenous jet-powered aircraft to replace American-supplied piston-engined T-6 Texans. The company had already constructed a small turbojet engine to power just such an aircraft, but the first T1F1 was powered by an imported Bristol Siddeley Orpheus engine. The design leaned heavily on the North American F-86 Sabre. Designated T-1A by the JASDF, the Orpheus-powered aircraft began to enter service in 1961 and by July of the following year 68 had been delivered. The company also produced a T1-B version, powered, or rather underpowered, by the Japan Jet Engine Co. J5-3. This engine delivered only two-thirds of the thrust of the Bristol engine.

General Dynamics F-16A

The F-16 is undoubtedly one of the most important fighter aircraft of this century. It started fairly innocuously as a technology demonstrator to see to what degree it would be possible to build a useful fighter that was significantly smaller and cheaper than the F-15 Eagle. The US Air Force termed this the Lightweight Fighter programme and it was not initially intended to lead to a production aircraft. Contracts for two prototypes each of the General Dynamics YF1 and Northrop YF230 were awarded in April 1972. Interest in the concept from a number of America's NATO allies led to a total revision of the LWF program; it was subsequently announced that the US Air Force would buy 408 of the successful Air Combat Fighter design. In December 1974 the General Dynamics design was announced as the winner. The first production F-16A was flown on August 7, 1978.
