This research examined the extent to which minority or "disadvantaged" group members engendered threat reactions from interaction partners. Participants' cardiovascular responses marking challenge and threat were obtained during social interactions with White or Black confederates who described their background as either socioeconomically advantaged or disadvantaged. Main effects for race and status were found. When interacting with Black or disadvantaged confederates, participants exhibited cardiovascular threat responses, whereas participants interacting with White or advantaged confederates primarily exhibited cardiovascular challenge responses. Consistent with cardiovascular responses, participants paired with White partners performed better during a cooperative task than participants paired with Black partners. In contrast to the physiological and behavioral indicators, self-reports indicated greater liking and more agreement with positive statements for Black partners than White partners. These findings demonstrate the value of multiple and less consciously controlled measures for the study of intergroup relations.

Many theorists have hypothesized that responses such as anxiety, stress, and threat underlie the negative or awkward reactions that occur during intergroup encounters (Gaertner & Dovidio, 1986; Gudykunst, 1984; Stephan & Stephan, 1983, 2000). However, the precise nature of these negative reactions during intergroup interactions has proven difficult to identify methodologically. Various concerns of interactants may inhibit or distort self-report responses within intergroup contexts, particularly if the reactions are negatively valenced (Guglielmi, 1999). In addition, the discrepancy between expressed and felt reactions may operate below conscious awareness (Greenwald & Banaji, 1993).

Arguably, psychophysiological measurements provide a means to circumvent distortions in perceivers' responses to intergroup interactions (Blascovich, 2000; Cacioppo, Tassinary, & Bernston, 2000; Guglielmi, 1999). Physiological measures have several advantages over self-report measures in this regard. Specifically, they are continuous, covert, and online (Blascovich, 2000). These qualities allow researchers to track changes indexed by physiological responses during behavioral episodes such as those involving intergroup encounters. Furthermore, the use of less consciously controlled measures reduces concerns regarding demand characteristics and self-presentational issues that can be evoked during an intergroup interaction. Because of these qualities, physiological measures can provide less contaminated assessments of the effect of intergroup encounters.

In a recent review of the applicability of psychophysiological measures to the study of prejudice and inter-

Black Studies and the Democratization of American Higher Education Charles P. Henry, 2016-12-11 This book aims to expand what scholars know and who is included in this discussion about black studies which aids in the democratization of American higher education and the deconstruction of traditional disciplines of high education to facilitate a sense of social justice By challenging traditional disciplines black studies reveals not only the political role of American universities but also the political aspects of the disciplines that constitute their core While black studies is post modern in its deconstruction of positivism and universalism it does not support a radical rejection of all attempts to determine truth Evolving from a form of black cultural nationalism it challenges the perceived white cultural nationalist norm and has become a critical multiculturalism that is more global and less gendered Henry argues for the inclusion of black studies beyond the curriculum of colleges and universities
