ABSTRACT

Writing and submitting a paper can be a daunting prospect, especially the first time. One of the more challenging aspects is knowing how to begin. Countless projects in the workplace never make it past local dissemination or conference presentation. This informal guide will help you take that next step and begin the peer-reviewed publication journey.

Keywords: education; research; How to; continual professional development; Evidence-based practice; radiologic technology; radiation oncology; Radiography; Radiation therapy

RÉSUMÉ

Rédiger et soumettre un article peut être une perspective intimidante, surtout la première fois. L'un des aspects les plus difficiles est de savoir par où commencer. D'innombrables projets en milieu professionnel ne vont jamais au-delà de la diffusion locale ou de la présentation à une conférence. Ce guide informel vous aidera à franchir l'étape suivante et à vous lancer dans la publication d'articles évalués par des pairs.

Learning objectives

By the end of this article, readers will be able to:

- Select an appropriate article type to write for publication in a medical radiation sciences (MRS) journal.
- Explain the function and structure of the various sections of a traditional research paper.
- Explore various strategies to improve writing style and flow.
- Understand the role of mentorship and authorship expectations when writing a manuscript for publication.
- Plan, draft and collaborate on writing a manuscript for submission to an MRS journal.

About the authors

This paper was the result of a collaboration between two entirely different authors. Andrew is an Australian diagnostic radiographer at the Princess Alexandra Hospital, Brisbane. In his spare time, he is a Managing Editor for Radiopaedia.org and an Associate Editor for the Journal of Medical Imaging and Radiation Sciences (JMIRS). He has published work on artificial intelligence, CT image reconstruction and radiographer led image interpretation in Australian hospitals.

Amanda is a Canadian radiation therapist and faculty member in the University of Alberta's Radiation Therapy Program. She is also the Editor in Chief of JMIRS. Amanda is primarily a qualitative researcher interested in patient care, education and LGBTQ health. Although we work in different areas and publish different kinds of work, we are passionate about encouraging people in the medical radiation sciences (MRS) to get writing and get published. We are often asked for advice on how to write journal articles. This is our response.

Introduction

Medical radiation sciences (MRS) professionals are good at conducting research to solve clinical problems in the workplace.
