

Basic Bone Histomorphometry

Stereologic Basis

The measurement and analysis of bone structure and bone remodeling is called bone histomorphometry. It is usually performed on cancellous bone from transiliac biopsies.

The isotropic (randomly oriented) nature of trabeculae in iliac bone is assumed, and allows two-dimensional measurements (area) to be converted to, and expressed as, three-dimensional (volume) measurements. This is a fundamental stereologic principle used in histomorphometry.

Isotropy also implies that structures are viewed and measured at some random degree of obliquity. Therefore, a correction factor for obliquity ($4/\pi$) is used in all thickness measurements.*
