

Fig. 3.2 (c)

The right shoulder (posterior view)

The scapula (Fig. 3.2c)

The scapula (scapula 8.1) is shoulder blade. (Fig. 3.2c) is a flat triangular bone situated on the posterior-lateral aspect of the upper chest wall. It has three angles, three borders and costal and dorsal surfaces, the latter being marked by a ridge-shaped spine running almost horizontally.

The spine is wider laterally where it gives the acromion process, but continues as it passes medially to the upper and lower borders, diverging as it meets the medial border forming a small smooth triangular area. Above the spine there is a deep hollow called the suprascapular fossa and below a larger flat shallow depression called the subscapular fossa.

The lateral angle is expanded and forms the process which fits articulation with the head of the humerus at the shoulder joint. It also has a deep bony projection pointing forwards and below the lateral end of the clavicle called the coracoid process, which is roughened for the attachment of muscle.

Pulping

The whole length of the spine can be palpated between the acromion process laterally and the medial border of the scapula medially. Its upper and lower tips can be distinguished easily, although they give attachment to the superior and inferior muscles, respectively. The posterior surface is convex to posterior and visible, being narrow medially but gradually broadening as it passes laterally to form the superior surface of the acromion. At the point it is covered by a bone the supra-acromial bursa, making the skin to move easily over the bone. The bone then appears to form a large smooth lateral surface, which is directed upwards and slightly backwards forming a posterior lateral and short anterior border. On its medial side can be palpated the lateral end of the clavicle and the small gap produced by the acromioclavicular joint. The smooth triangular area at the medial end of the spine is also covered by a bursa and can be palpated through the trapezius lower fibres of the trapezius.

The medial border of the scapula is approximately 7 cm lateral to the spine at the medial end and slightly convex medially. Its full length can only be palpated with difficulty, except as thin ridges, as it gives attachment to various scapular above and shoulder angle and lower below, as well as being directly con-
