

Beekeeping: A Bibliography of Resources in the Erwin Library, Wayne Community College

Beekeeping, or, more formally, Apiculture, is an ancient endeavor, and the three main products of cultivating bees, honey, beeswax and pollination, still have uses in many areas of our lives.

Not only do we find honey in our food, but in our cough syrup and our skin treatments. Honey doesn't just sweeten our food it nourishes, by adding essential minerals and vitamins, and even produces a calming effect when added to tea or coffee.

Mead, or honey wine, is still just as delightful as it was in medieval times when the Norse people believed it made the drinker into a poet or scholar. Also, when it maintains contact with our skin, honey releases a good amount of hydrogen peroxide, which is why it can be used to cover a wound before bandaging as an antiseptic and to aid in healing.

A beeswax candle burns brighter, longer and cleaner than any other candle, even emitting negative ions which clean the air. And though beeswax is still prized for candle making, it is also used in lip balm, soap making, polishes and lubricants.

Of most importance however to human survival, as well as human enjoyment and convenience, is the pollination activity of the honeybee. "Honey bees are the most economically valuable pollinator worldwide, and many high-value crops such as almonds, apples, avocados, blueberries, cherries, and cranberries, are almost entirely reliant upon pollination services of commercial beekeepers. Globally, 9.5% of the total economic value of agricultural production for human consumption comes from insect pollination:

- One in three bites of food we eat is dependent on honey bees for pollination.
- Of the 100 crops that provide 90 percent of the world's food, over 70 are pollinated by bees.
- In North America, honey bees pollinate nearly 95 kinds of fruits, such as apples and cranberries."

Possibly as a result of these many services to us, the honeybee is now the official state insect for seventeen states, including North Carolina.

Learning more about the practical implementation of apiculture, and the many uses of its products to enrich our lives, is the purpose of the information resources included in this bibliography.
