

Basics of Reading Music

Music is written on five lines called the Staff. Bass players read in Bass Clef. The bass clef has two dots that surround the line on which the pitch "F" is written. The notes are divided into two groups, notes on the spaces...

and notes on the lines...

So far we have found the natural notes on the bass. These are notes without sharps (F) or flats (F). Between the pitches B and C is a half step (one fret). Between the pitches E and F is also a half step. Between all other pitches is a whole step (two frets). The notes that occur in the middle of these whole steps are called accidentals.

Notice that all of these chromatic pitches have two names. A[#] is also B^b. This is called an enharmonic spelling. Which name you use depends on what key you are in. In the key of E^b, you would call a note "B^b," where in the key of E, you would call that same pitch "D[#]." Most often, when a line is ascending, a pitch becomes raised. For example a chromatic line from A would be A-A[#]-B. Descending from B it would be B-B^b-A.

Note: When an accidental appears in a bar of music, it applies to the whole measure unless it is cancelled out with another accidental.
