

and the processes they must adopt to bring other stakeholders together and work towards a long-term agenda has been highlighted well.

The chapter on SEWA in the new millennium looks like a strategic plan document SEWA has formulated for its intervention in the new millennium. The experience it has gained in the last one decade gave the organisation a belief that change is possible and that the poor, given the necessary support, can bring about change. This chapter focuses on four critical areas and explains in brief how the organisation plans to use them. The strategy it proposes is: capital formation among poor; capacity building; access to social security and collective strength through organisation. It also understands that all these are interdependent and hence must be integrated. This integration is what the organisation will look for while it envisages its development programme, decides on the target group and implements the same. This chapter has come up so well and is an instructive read for leaders of development organisations—what-so-ever be the organisational size.

Personally, the book has opened up my thinking process and has given me new insights into many aspects, which was once unknown to me. I would recommend this book to all those who want to wipe out tears from the eyes of the underprivileged section. The book tells us that honesty of purpose, dedication and a professional outlook to the development process is what is expected from those who have immersed themselves into the sector. I sincerely hope that more Nanavaties (Reema Nanavaty) will arrive at the scene and immerse themselves in this sector. We require them.
