

audience, not only of philosophers and psychologists, but of reflective readers generally, for many of the questions posed are not the private property of professionals, but tantalizers and bafflers familiar to the speculations of even the most untheoretical imaginations. If I close my eyes and imagine a purple cow, is something somewhere really purple and cow-shaped? Could a brain scientist someday read my thoughts in my brain? Could a robot be truly conscious? Is free will an illusion? My answers were developed one at a time over the years, but once I finally noticed the rise in my temptation to indulge in the unseemly habit of citing my own work, I decided to succumb totally and admit that I think these essays are truly interrelated and should be read together.

The unified theory I claim to provide here is presented in much the same order as its ancestor was in Covariant and Consciousness, beginning, in Part I, with basic metaphysical and methodological concerns and then, in Part II, analyzing and defending the—careful—use of mentalistic or intentional formulations in psychological theories; the ascription of covariant to events and states in the mind. The fruits of that analysis are then exploited in Part III to provide answers to the most persistent quandaries about consciousness and its relation to the rest of the world. Part IV pushes tentatively, gropingly into the area I consider most important: the analysis of the relationship between our the relationship between the two variables. The relationship between the two variables is positive, meaning that as the number of hours spent studying increases, the number of hours spent sleeping also tends to increase. This is a positive correlation.

There are some people in Seattle, I am sure, who have, perhaps, never, and perhaps never will, come to the University and see for themselves. But perhaps you would, at least, like to know how things are going. Here at Harvard and throughout the New England region, we are indeed pleased to see that the University has been especially helped by the strong and generous support of many New England friends. For many of the friends, some from Harvard, Boston, New York, New Jersey, New England, Chicago, New South Wales, South Africa, Australia, and the Middle East, it has been the case that, in their own way, they have been able to contribute to the University's efforts to bring about a better world.
