Good rehearsal facilities for musicians are essential. Directive 2003/10/EC necessitates that musicians are protected from noise exposure. A code of conduct gives the guidelines how this should be done. This study examines room acoustics recommendations provided by the Finnish code of conduct, and discusses whether they are adequate. Small teaching facilities were measured after renovation and compared to earlier measurements. Teachers' opinions were inquired about the facilities before and after. The renovation did not decrease the noise exposure of the teachers. However, the majority preferred the facilities after the renovation. The Finnish code of conduct is not sufficient for facilities where loud instruments are played, or band practise. Good facilities can be designed but they must be specified at the designing stage for their intended use.

1. INTRODUCTION

The new noise directive (2003/10/EC) requires that member states of the European Union (EU) shall draw up a code of conduct for the music and entertainment sector [1]. The purpose of this code is to provide practical guidelines to help workers and employers meet the legal obligations laid down by that directive. The Finnish code of conduct [2, 3] was adopted in February 2007, one year after the noise directive was included in Finnish legislation.

The Finnish code of conduct states that the music and entertainment sector consists of musicians, actors and technical personnel [2]. In addition, those who work in discos and concert houses are in this sector, too. The final group that are included are music teachers. The code of conduct also acknowledges that there are permanent and temporary workers in all of these groups.

As with the noise directive [1], the code of conduct [2] prioritises collective measures such as the design of the rooms and the selection of quiet instruments. The remaining risks should be covered by the use of hearing protectors. Some form of noise exposure monitoring scheme is also required.

The Finnish code of conduct acknowledges that the music being played sets requirements for rooms [2]. It provides recommendations for room volumes and reverberation times. Design issues are referred to in Standard No. SFS 5907:2004 [4]. The special requirements of high intelligibility are recognised in the selection and use of hearing protectors.
