

The Three Hiroshima Panoramas, Photography of October, 1945; each approx. 8 ft in length. Marginal notes in English and Japanese. NEAR SHIMA HOSPITAL, 20 Linda Lane, Normal, IL 61761. Price: $25.00 ppd. No ISBN. (Reviewed by William L. Trousdale.)

As the confrontation and antagonism between the superpowers winds down, there is a sense of relief that the world now has a good chance of avoiding a nuclear holocaust. However, in these more optimistic times it is important to remember that there exist tens of thousands of nuclear warheads. The missiles and airplanes that can reliably deliver these weapons are in place. The nuclear-armed nations of the world continue to hold one another in jeopardy and to threaten the biological viability of the world. Even if that time were to arrive when all nuclear warheads would have been peacefully destroyed, the knowledge of how to build them would remain. The century that is coming to a close should have taught us that the enormous productive capacity of the industrial age has made war an irrational choice. The invention of nuclear weapons during World War II converted the choice of going to war from an irrationality to an insanity.

It is from this view that the Hiroshima photographs are useful. These three panoramas are best seen displayed fully, as a mural. The combination of distant and close-up views conveys some idea of the physical effects of a nuclear explosion. What had been a city became a wasteland. Buildings were converted to rubble, ashes, or shells. It remains difficult to believe that all this destruction resulted from a single explosion. Fully displayed, these photographs make vivid the enormity of nuclear explosions.

But these photographs do not completely convey the effect of nuclear war. The Hiroshima bomb was one small bomb on one small city. Its energy release was one part in a million of present arsenals. There is also no direct evidence of the human suffering caused by the explosion. It requires an act of imagination to realize that when the bomb went off, these streets and buildings were filled with real, living people. The photographs, taken two months after the explosion, show a few people on the streets. Where did they come from? Are they some of the survivors? The rescuers? Are they the walking dead? In this sense the photographs provide a sanitized view of the Hiroshima bombing and of the consequences of nuclear war. But it is precisely that sanitized view, an artistic transformation, that makes the photographs effective. They force us to the next level of comprehension.

William Trousdale is Associate Professor of Physics, Emeritus at Wesleyan University, Middletown, CT. He taught a course on Nuclear War from 1979 to 1988.

An Institute for an Empire: The Physikalisch-Technische Reichsanstalt, 1871-1918. David Cahan. 315 pp. Cambridge U.P., New York, 1989. Price not given. ISBN 0-521-33057-2. (Reviewed by Zaoqye Wang.)

Germany's Physikalisch-Technische Reichsanstalt (Imperial Institute of Physics and Technology) was unique in several respects. Perhaps the largest and best equipped physics institution in the world at the turn of the century, it led the way into the era of Big Science. It employed (literally and unprecedentedly) dozens of physicists and conducted much scientific research, all at the expense of the Reich government. As the official agency responsible for standardizing and testing new technological products, it also embodied the increasing interactions among science, industry, and government in a rapidly industrializing and expanding society. These are themes of David Cahan's fine history of the Reichsanstalt in its early years. Putting it in the multidimensional social context of the young German Empire, he does a good job in explaining the Reichsanstalt's origin, growth, achievements, and failures.

The idea of a government-sponsored institute of precision technology at Berlin, to aid both science and industry, was first proposed by a group of Prussian scientists to their state in 1872, shortly after the Franco-Prussian War. At that time, German physics was undergoing a sweeping institutional revolution, many physics institutes being constructed by the individual German states. Yet for fear of generating competition with the academic institutions and other reasons, the Prussian government delayed in approving the proposed Prussian Physical-Mechanical Institute for more than a decade.

The lack of progress deeply worried Werner von Siemens, who was involved in the project from the beginning. A powerful, millionaire industrial scientist, Siemens decided in 1883 to take the matter "into his own hands." Recognizing the "national meaning" of the future institute, he changed its sponsorship. In 1884 he asked the Reich to create the Reichsanstalt, with a patriotic offer of his own land and significant funds for the institute. Bismarck agreed immediately, despite the tradition that scientific affairs belonged to the individual German states, not the Reich. The Imperial Chancellor hoped the Reichsanstalt would help to strengthen the new Empire by making Berlin the Reich's scientific center.

Siemens and his many scientist friends, especially Hermann von Helmholtz, believed in science as the foundation of technology. Science, they argued, deserved government's support for its potential in bringing economic benefits and raising Germany's national prestige. They envisioned primarily a scientific research institute financed by the government. It was to be a scientist's heaven, to do whatever research he saw fit without the burden of teaching. The legislative Reichstag was initially unconvinced. The powerful technological community (engineers, instrument makers, etc.) demanded a more practical orientation for the Reichsanstalt. To compromise, the institute had to do more for the economy. Two sections evolved: The Scientific Section conducted research of interest to both science and industry, while the Technological Section carried out the more directly useful research and routine testing work.
