Abstract

Purpose: the paper aims to investigate if the countries that conduct cross border investments and trade are transferring their own culture to the host countries. Methodology: culture was represented by book collections' data selected by the digital library LibraryThing. In total 2,569 book-titles that represent the 50 top books of 52 country-groups have been used as the study's sample. Author's Nationality was set as the country of influence. Statistical analysis was employed to measure if the book collections of LT users were of foreigner-driven or homoethnic-driven authorship. Findings: the most industrialized countries and the best exporting countries were the best performers in culture transferring. Statistical significance with the amount of the books traded abroad was found to (i) the outward FDI in millions of $ ($p=0.004$), (ii) the stock of outward FDI in millions of $ ($p<0.001$), (iii) the outward FDI as GDP percentage ($p=0.004$), and (v) the export volume index ($p=0.011$). Regression analysis showed that outward FDI in mil. $ ($p=0.016$) and outward FDI stock in mil. $ ($p<0.001$) were significant predictors of a country's success to transfer its own cultural product abroad. Originality/value: this research is addressed to a tangible cultural output, books, issuing the objectiveness in measurements.

1. Introduction

The way FDI bridge or aggravate cultural difference between the investor and the host country by changing consumers' behavior in arts and literature so far is an uncharted field of research. Culture is not only manifested in labor abilities, communication skills, customs, traditions, and social behavior but also in civilization, heritage, and intellectual and artistic creations. Among these categories of culture, in this article we investigate intellectual creations which are embodied in books. Books are the final product of published literature and appertain also to the artistic creations. Consequently, book sales are a measure of demand and reflect a cultural outcome. The demand on specific books and authors is formed by reading preferences. Literature upon reading preferences is limited. Nevertheless data regarding yearly sales (amount, revenues and international trade), can be traced on the internet for a few countries but the distinction of foreign and domestic authorship is not directly detectable.
