

The Lord of the Rings is not a book, to be described in a few sentences. It is an heroic romance – 'something which has scarcely been attempted in this world since Spenser's Fairie Queene – as one can't praise the book by comparisons – there is nothing to compare it with. What can I say about it?' continues Richard Hughes. 'The scale of imagination it almost suggests parallel, and it is surely so remarkable for its vividness and for the narrative skill which carries the reader on, enthralled, for page after page.'

By an extraordinary feat of the imagination Mr Tolkien has created, and sustained in every detail, a new mythology in an invented world. As for the story itself 'It's really super serious fiction', declared Naomi Mitchison after reading the first part, The Fellowship of the Ring, 'but it is timeless and will go on and on. It's odd you know. One takes it completely seriously – as seriously as Moby-Dick.'

C. S. Lewis is equally enthusiastic. 'If Aristotle treated it as invention (in fact he does not) he would still lack its heroic seriousness. No imaginary world has been projected which is at once multi-farious and so true to its own inner laws, none so meaningfully objective, so distanced from the taint of an author's merely individual psychology, none so relevant to the actual human situation yet so free from allegory. And what fine shading there is in the variations of style to meet the almost endless diversity of scenes and characters – comic, heroic, epic, monstrous, or diabolic.'

Spenser, Moby-Dick, Atticus in Science Fiction? A Beowulf of all of them and a taste of its own. Only those who have read The Lord of the Rings will realise how impossible it is to convey all the qualities of a great book.

'He has distilled elements of Norse, Teutonic and Celtic myth to make a strange but coherent world of his own, presented with a tinged joy in natural beauty and a constant underflow of embodied terror.' The Sunday Times.
