(Pharmacotherapy 1997;17(5):1050-1061)

The traditional system of providing drug therapy to patients, in which only certain health care professionals are authorized to initiate drug therapy, is under attack at many levels. The processes of drug prescribing, dispensing, administration, monitoring, and dosage adjustment, as practiced in this traditional system, occur in a disjointed fashion that frequently results in avoidable drug-related problems that contribute significantly to poor patient outcomes and increased medical costs.¹

Collaborative drug therapy management, characterized by an interdisciplinary approach to patient care, is emerging as a solution that can maximize the patient's health-related quality of life, reduce the frequency of avoidable drug-related problems, and improve societal benefits from pharmaceuticals. In this approach to care, drug therapy decision making and management are coordinated collaboratively by pharmacists, physicians, other health care professionals, and the patient.

Many pharmacists with sufficient clinical training have or are willing to assume this level of responsibility for the patients they serve.

This document was written by the following 1996-1997 ACCP Task Force on Prescriptive Authority: Jannet M. Carmichael, Pharm.D., FCCP, BCPS, Chair; Beth Devine, Pharm.D., BCPS; Larry Ereshefsky, Pharm.D., FCCP, BCPP; H. William Kelly, Pharm.D., FCCP, BCPS; Glen L. Stimmel, Pharm.D., FCCP; and Mary Beth O'Connell, Pharm.D., FCCP, FASHP, BCPS, Board Liaison. Staff editor: Peggy G. Kuehl, Pharm.D., BCPS. Approved by the ACCP Board of Regents on April 4, 1997.

When participating in collaborative drug therapy management, pharmacists share the responsibility for patient outcomes, not just by providing basic dispensing functions and drug information services, but by solving patient- and medication-related problems and by making decisions regarding drug prescribing, monitoring, and drug regimen adjustments.

This statement represents the position of the American College of Clinical Pharmacy (ACCP) on the role of pharmacists in collaborative drug therapy management. Furthermore, a model for collaborative management of drug therapy is described and endorsed as a way to enhance the quality of patient care within health care systems.

ACCP Position Statement

The American College of Clinical Pharmacy advocates the role of qualified pharmacists as capable collaborative drug therapy managers. Furthermore, ACCP supports the pharmacists' role in collaborative drug therapy management to improve patient outcomes and increase efficiencies in the health care system. To participate in collaborative drug therapy management, pharmacists must have access to patients and patient health information, conduct patient assessments, document activities, and undergo quality assurance programs on these activities. Scope of practice statements, identifying pharmacists' professional authority and responsibility, shall be based on the pharmacist's credentials and the nature of the collaborative arrangement within the health care environment or system.
