

HENRI CARTIER-BRESSON

Henri Cartier-Bresson was the greatest photographer of the generation. In 1930, he became the first photographer in France to shoot a full-length, keeping his camera. This intuitive concept of photography was a revolution in editing and capturing what was seen with Cartier-Bresson's graphic and documentary approach.

After a middle-class childhood in Paris in 1910, Cartier-Bresson studied at the Académie de la Grande Peinture without any formal training. He soon became painting and drawing, despite the fact that he had a passion for photography. In 1931, he met for the first time a group of artists, among them the famous painter and sculptor Pablo Picasso, who was then in Paris. eventual, and in 1937, Cartier-Bresson made a documentary on the Republic of Weimar in Spain before going again, collaborating with Jean Renoir in 1939. Taken prisoner by the Germans in World War II, he managed to escape in 1943, and in 1945 made a documentary about the return of prisoners of war. In 1948, his work was exhibited at the Museum of Modern Art, and he traveled widely in the United States.

In 1947, Cartier-Bresson founded the Magnum agency together with Robert Capa, David Seymour, William Vandivert, and George Rodger. They began the great years as a photographic partnership, following India, Bali, Russia, and elsewhere. Cartier-Bresson also expanded book publishing as very important. In his first book, Images à la mesure du monde, published in 1948, he defined his philosophy of photography, which, as he explained, was rooted in "the decisive moment" — the phrase that provided the book's English title. His major, generous career, and quest for the perfect composition based on the Golden Section have deeply influenced several generations of reporters.

In 1950, he decided to leave Magnum — which continued to show his pictures — and began to travel independently, he turned to photography and increasingly embraced the genre of photography in his activities. His Strasbourg magazine in France found a very large retrospective of his work in 2002, which was organized by his friend and publisher, Robert Delpire.

The photograph captures a moment of quiet observation from a high vantage point, looking down at a person on a balcony. The building's facade is a complex grid of windows and architectural details, creating a strong sense of rhythm and geometry. The lighting is dramatic, with deep shadows and bright highlights, emphasizing the textures and forms of the architecture.
