

Aging: a Challenge to Science and Society (Volume I: Biology)

Edited by D. Danon, N.W. Shock and M. Marois

Oxford University Press, New York, $59.50 (hardcover).

1981, pp. 346 + xv, ISBN 0-19-261254-9

This book is the first of a trilogy based on the updated proceedings of an international interdisciplinary gerontological conference sponsored by l'Institut de la Vie, which was held in France in 1977. The objective of the conference was to evaluate the state of knowledge of all professional fields involved in gerontology. Although the information presented at the meeting may have been the last word at the time, the book was not published until 4 years later, dating much of the material.

While the lofty goals of interdisciplinary meetings are admirable in their intent to facilitate communication among experts in diverse fields, the results are seldom as constructive as the proponents anticipate. The reason is the usual disinclination for the folks in various specialties to interact with those in specialties other than their own. And even when the desire to interact is sincere, the unique jargon spoken by each group often masks the significance of one group's findings from those in other disciplines. Fortunately for readers of this book (an probably to the consternation of the conference planners), the books in this series are arranged by speciality.

Nevertheless, although the biological presentations are grouped together in this book, with the exception of the first chapter, a great deal of thought does not appear to have been given to the organization of the topics within the major chapter subheads. The first chapter is concerned with various aspects of the aging nervous and cardiovascular systems. The second chapter includes three sessions related to cellular aging, and then incongruously includes a session by Sacher on the biological prospects for life extension, and a session on the effects of environmental factors and life patterns on human life span, chaired by Shock. The third chapter has a session on the aging of human physiological functions (which relates to and could logically have been included together with the previous session by Shock), followed by another out-of-place session dealing largely with hormone action in mice and rats. The fourth chapter includes an excellent section on indices of human physiological age (which also would have gone well in the preceding chapter), with superlative papers by Shock and Tobin. These papers, now 6 years old, remain timely and are clearly the outstanding redeeming feature of the book. Also in chapter 4, is the concluding session on immunology chaired by Makinodan.

Overall, this book follows the unfortunate precedent of many other published gerontological conference proceedings, in that it comprises many unrelated papers, each covering a narrow topic of interest primarily to a selected group of specialists. The book should probably be acquired by institutional collections for historical value. However, despite a few pearls, because of the fairly steep price, overlong delay in publication, poor organization and diverse range of narrowly directed topics, individuals will probably be discouraged from purchasing the book for their private libraries.
