

All The World Is Here

Harvard's Peabody Museum of the American Indian and the History of Anthropology

Frederick Ward Putnam, often called the "father of American anthropology," directed Harvard's Peabody Museum between 1879 and 1909, where he helped create the modern discipline of anthropology. In addition to developing the museum and promoting field research, Putnam was Harvard's first anthropology professor. In 1893, Putnam and his protégé, Franz Boas, introduced the emerging field of anthropology to the public at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago. In contrast to the fair's exhibits where "exotic" peoples were presented as curiosities, Putnam and Boas argued instead that they formed around understanding the value of a new scientific approach to understanding human diversity and history.

"In a sense of anthropology is where is the history that people really are.
What is anthropology?"
