Abstract

Objective. The aim of this study is to culturally adapt and validate the Frommelt Attitude Toward Care of the Dying Scale Form B (FATCOD-B) in Spanish health professionals.

Method. A cultural adaptation and scale validation was carried out to evaluate the validity of appearance, content and construct, reliability and feasibility. The psychometric validation of the FATCOD-B was carried out on a sample of 2,446 Spanish physicians, nurses, psychologists, and social workers and students of these disciplines, between January 2017 and December 2018. This sample was selected by intentional sampling. Descriptive statistics were used to characterize the sample. An exploratory multi-group factor analysis was performed, internal consistency was evaluated by calculating Cronbach's α and stability by test-retest.

Results. A total of 2,446 people participated in the study, 1,134 students and 1,312 professionals. The exploratory multi-group factor analysis revealed a two-dimensional factor structure, with a total of 17 items retained in the model from the 30 of the original scale. The results showed that this version has adequate reliability ($\alpha = 0.79$) and for each subscale, and stability (ICC = 0.843, $p < 0.001$).

Significance of results. FATCOD has been used with physicians and nurses from different countries. However, no reports have been found in the literature of its use with psychologists and social workers. It is important to have an instrument that allows us to know the attitudes of these professionals since they are all directly involved in the care of patients at the end of their lives and their families. The Spanish version of FATCOD-B has proven to be a reliable and valid instrument for its use in Spanish health professionals while allowing comparisons between disciplines.

Introduction

Many chronic patients will at some point have end-of-life palliative needs (Gómez-Batiste et al., 2014). In order to achieve the best possible quality of life for patients and families, health professionals need to acquire specific skills and have positive attitudes toward palliative care, so that they can respond appropriately to patients' and their families' needs (Smith, 2003; de Vlieger et al., 2004; Agusti et al., 2018; Jiang et al., 2019).

Bandura (1990) defines competence as the ability to translate secondary skills (cognitive, social, emotional, and sensory-motor), knowledge, values, and attitudes into appropriate actions. Attitudes refer to the positive or negative evaluations that people make about any aspect of reality (Brinhol et al., 2007). Traditionally, attitudes have been considered to have three fundamental components: affective (feelings or affective evaluation about the attitude object), cognitive (knowledge, opinion, conviction, or thought about the attitude object) and behavioral (behavior in the presence of the attitude object) (Escámez et al., 2007). Attitudes are directly related to the thoughts and beliefs one has toward the object of attitude.

The training that health professionals receive in relation to end-of-life care has been found to be deficient: Agusti et al. (2018) showed how medical students showed great concern about the death of patients. On the other hand, Bassals et al. (2014) conclude in their review on end-of-life attitudes in nursing students that little time is usually devoted to palliative care education or that it is often included in other specialized nursing courses. This can cause stress and anxiety for professionals when caring for patients in end-of-life situations, which can affect their own health in the long term (Cox et al., 2009; Mallory, 2003; Caton and Klemm, 2006; Shoji et al., 2016).
