

Doerr, John. Measure What Matters: How Google, Bono, and the Gates Foundation Rock the World With OKRs. Penguin, 2018.

This book is written by Doerr, who is the chair of a venture capitalist group. The book describes how a business organization can use OKRs to drive a company's focus through agility, which leads to explosive growth. These are first-person, behind-the-scenes case studies narrated by leaders like Bill Gates. This book helps guide understanding of the business management strategies that drive the success of large companies.

Abstract: a summary of what we'll find in a research paper: its topic, problem, methodology, findings, conclusions

²² This research paper analyzes the correlation that exists between sleep and high school student performance in class. To answer this question, we compared academic performance against questionnaires that detailed the sleep schedules of 122 high school students. Our results showed that there was a positive correlation between poor academic performance and getting fewer than 8 hours of sleep a night. The results also revealed that poor sleep patterns can lead to concentration and behavior issues. The implications of this study could be used to promote high schoolers sleeping at least 8 hours a night.

Literature review: a summary of existing research on the topic to bolster our own thesis and suggest ways to move that research forward

Pippa Norris's book, Digital Divide Civic Engagement, Information Poverty, and the Internet Worldwide, is cited frequently in research on the digital divide. Published in 2001, just six years after the Internet became commercialized, Norris frames her book within the context of social, global and democratic divides and looks at the digital divide within the broader issues of inequalities across a multitude of economic and political components. She compares 179 countries in terms of Internet access and discusses how it affects the democratic process (2001). An extensive cross section of population was studied in order to obtain information within three levels of analysis: macro, meso, and micro using both institutional and individual data (Norris, 2001). Norris contends that analysis needs to be performed between countries, not just the United States as democracies vary between countries and what may work in the United States does not necessarily hold true for other democracies (2001). Norris' research was one of the first attempts to pinpoint the impact the newly developed Internet would have on the global population. Economists, such as Jeffrey James, from the Department of Economics, Tilburg University in the Netherlands, attempt to quantify the digital divide by developing formulas to determine the relative and the absolute digital ratio, hypothesizing that "innovations are more likely to be adopted when per capita income in a developing country is closer to the income of the originating developed country" (James, 2010, p. 123). James contends that from an economic standpoint, the most important issue is whether closing the digital gap will result in an increased rate of growth (2007, p. 288) and
