

SET APART

Always now he carried a pearl-handled grudge, snub-nosed, heavy, hoistered close to his heart,

Where once he held his tongue, he carried a black, good steel that held only its cold keen edge.

He drove his mind so hard it sang like whining wheels rolling high over gaps and gorges on trestles of determination. Rounding turns, he came on his black thoughts, hunched over centrally like buzzards eating carrion on the road.

The thing or two he knew he carried folded like the certain knowledge of hundred dollar bills whispering in a side flap of his wallet.

And drove toward mountains, and a self he would become old man in faded denim, gray as a weathered barn, fence post at a field's edge—until he moved.

ON THE WINGS OF A DOVE

Now, after he'd come back from Ohio, he worked at road construction for a summer back up on the Laurel and Ivy Rivers in Jackson. After work, instead of going off the way to Asheville, he'd stop by (Chandler's) in Marshall, buy some whole, and drive to a place down on the French Broad River below Hudson Dam. Pulling his car down a sandy road, nesting it back into the willows and sycamores so far they closed around it, he'd sit there after sundown, the smell of tar and sweat and asphalt in his clothes, smoking and drinking white, listening to bluegrass on the radio, watching the river, mountains, and sky run together in the coming dark.

Cashiermen built fires along the bank, and over on the island, and hung their lanterns out over the water. His troubles sat right under his breastbone, black as a tree full of scarings, all talking at once.
But when Bill Monroe and the Bluegrass Boys played What a Little Longer, Jesus or Blue Moon it came by, and his mind throbbed and hummed the pattern under the hood of a good truck loading his thoughts over a long open highway, and the lights on the riverbank got in tune, his mind turned into a whining sawblade spinning so fast it grew invisible and quiet.
