

ETHNOGENESIS IN COLONIAL AMERICA

The Bioarchaeology of Identity in Spanish Colonial Florida: Social and Evolutionary Transformation before, during, and after Demographic Collapse

ABSTRACT In this article, I consider the effects of Spanish missionization on indigenous identity and biological interaction patterns. Odontometric data were recorded for 26 skeletal samples dating to three time periods: precontact (C.E. 1200–1400), early mission (C.E. 1600–1650), and late mission (C.E. 1650–1700). Population genetic analyses generated estimates of regional genetic variation (F_{ST}) and intersample genetic distances. Genetic variation during the precontact period was limited despite documented linguistic and cultural variation. Variation increased during the early mission period, indicating a decline in between-group interaction despite inclusion within a single colonial sociopolitical framework. During the late mission period, variation declined significantly, indicating a dramatic reduction in between-group variability consistent with genetic drift and gene flow between communities. I discuss these results in terms of archaeological and historical models of postcolonial transformation and suggest an emerging polyethnic community was resident in La Florida preceding the subsequent diaspora caused by burgeoning European military conflict in eastern North America. [Keywords: La Florida missions, population genetics, ethnogenesis, odontometrics]

IN THIS ARTICLE, I use bioarchaeological data and population genetic analyses to reconstruct changes in biological interaction patterns throughout 16th- and 17th-century La Florida. I approach this topic not through the mechanistic lens of evolutionary theory but, instead, through highlighting potential contributions to the anthropological study of identity and its transformation in postcolonial contexts (ethnogenesis). The study of ethnicity, identity, and ethnogenesis is one potentially unifying agenda for a holistic anthropology, and bioarchaeology can contribute significantly in advancing this initiative. Contributions from ethnohistoric sources center advanced discussion of these topics within postcolonial frameworks where rich historical resources are supplemented by historical archaeology (Furari et al. 1999). Ethnohistory transcends the past-present dichotomy, allowing formulation of dynamic hypotheses regarding ethnogenesis within specific social-historical contexts (Storrevant 1971).

Effectively eschewing static concepts of the "colonized" and the "colonizer," recent literature has focused on the manner in which indigenous populations manipulate power structures in the creation of their histories (see contributions in Ferguson and Whitehead 1992; Hill 1996a, 1996b; Trigger and Washburn 1997). By design, such research is grounded in tightly controlled historical contexts with primary focus on postcolonial tribal transformations and processes of social adaptation among competing indigenous communities and resistance against their respective foreign occupiers. Naïve assumptions of passivity have been replaced by active agency as the model defining indigenous adaptation to changing sociopolitical circumstances. That is, indigenous
