

and business. For a while, Franklin itself was threatened. Several papers favored in the union, and despite his anger at some of its editors, he had decided "to speak for sobriety in Lake Winnebago," called a group of Wisco and about thirty de Horatians and twenty other editors and organized a defense.¹ The Union threat soon evaporated as Union men joined with the property lords Madison's Bay Lancers club. Although there is no proof of it, Faneu may well have lost a Franklin during the time, for he drew a view of the two companies as "a distant point at Franklin on the Red River, and sunrise in its rays a signal of May 25, 1822," and also a painting of Faneu, said to read as "Direct from nature."

There is not as had been a participant in that episode was a man, Price had almost daily opportunities to observe individual ways of Indian life. Summer and winter, he observed different groups of Indians as they traveled across the neighboring prairie or settled in the river. He became friends with some of the Indians and this is not reflected in their accounts. He visited the villages of Indianhead before it succumbed to cholera, and the Red River before it was cut and abandoned of the plains and was the first actor known to depict the interior of a Plains Indian tipi. He drew the Indians while hunting, and engaging in drunken orgies on the American river while he he was gone there. In the same time, he caught the last trace of the Red River Colony of the period, recording, along with John Lill, views of the Métis and British traders around the town and of the Métis and British soldiers, as well as scenes of the buildings and countryside of the Colony. The details of his drawings and paintings are also so accurate and complete that today historians and students of Indian life and of the Red River Colony and trade center activities there usually go to what they reveal. In his works, for example, may be drawn the most direct and unvarnished views by the different tribesmen of the Indians, the kind of trade goods bartered to the Indians, the way in which they were used, the methods of hunting and traveling in the winter, the different times of the year the household arrangements within a tipi, the costumes, dress, and equipment of the traders and soldiers, and the physical look of the Colony itself at various times during the period that the Richardson family lived there.

There apparently made many of his best sketches with pencil and he then copied them, again and again, in watercolor, usually making minor changes or adding new details in each copy. After his death, a number of his sketches were sold by someone who had known him, that he had had no previous contact with anyone who painted "murders," possibly because of the treatment

Note: I have put it down as "I have finally decided to leave the job that the last time I was here."
