

and handiwork. For a while, Pendleton itself was threatened. General Sargent turned to the artist, and despite his anger at some of the notes he had decided "to work for safety to Lake Winnipeg," rather a group of Sioux and about thirty de Montmorency and many other who were not against a defense." The Sioux threat was repulsed, the Yankton made peace with the property under Hudson's Bay Company about. Although there is no proof of it, Fries may well have been a Pendleton during the time, for he drew a view of the two companies men "in the best picture at Pendleton on the Red River, and captures by its scope a typical of May 25, 1822," and also a painting of Yankton, which he used as "Driven from nature."

Whether or not he had been a participant in that episode was to Fries, Fries had almost daily opportunities to depict tribal aspects of Indian life. Summer and winter, he observed different groups of Indians as they traveled across the neighboring prairie or gathered in the river. He became friends with some of the Indians and told us his relations in their camps. He visited the villages of Indian tribes of small dwelling Chippewas and the buffalo-skin tipi of the Gros Ventre and Mandanians of the plains and was the first artist known to depict the interior of a Plains Indian tipi. He drew the Indian skin hunting, and mapping in drawings on the American walls which he had seen given them. At the same time, he caught the full force of the Red River Colony of the period, recording, along with later the view of the Métis and British traders around the town and of the Indian and French settlers, as well as scenes of the buildings and country side of the Colony. The details of his sketches and paintings were also in accurate and complete that today historians and students of Indian life and of the Red River Colony and trade center activities there are fully to what they reveal. In his works, for example, may be observed the most dress and ornamentation worn by the different tribesmen on the plains; the kind of trade goods bartered to the Indians; the way in which they were used; the methods of hunting and traveling in the winter; the changes in the year; the household arrangements within the tipi; the customs, dress, and equipment of the traders and settlers; and the general look of the Colony itself at various times during the period that the Richardson family lived there.

Fries apparently made many of his first sketches with pencil and ink and then copied them, again and again, in watercolor, usually making minor changes or adding new details in each copy. After his death, he was used by someone who had known him that he had had an opportunity of seeing all painting "missing," possibly because of the treatment
