

Recent South African Labor Legislation: Assessing the New Rights of Black Workers

L. J. FROEDIGER

In early November of 1981, 400,000 black workers in South Africa joined in a two-day political strike to protest anti-Pretoria and poor educational opportunities.¹ The strike, organized by political groups, student organizations, and black trade unions, was the largest in South African history, and shut down much of the industry in parts of the nation.² The week-long strike shut down 500 percent of the factories in Pieteritz, Johannesburg, and in industrial towns east of Johannesburg. It was almost percent effective in shutting down much of Johannesburg.³ Violent clashes with police led to several deaths.⁴ The government responded by detaining a number of union leaders without charges, including Chris Dlamini, the General-Secretary of the Federation of South African Trade Unions, and Mphahlele Cauter, the General-Secretary of the Council of Unions in South Africa.⁵

This incident illustrates the difficulties faced by the black union movement in South Africa. Although recently enacted legislation reduces strikes and their labor unions with more legal rights than ever before, it nonetheless prescribes conditions within which the union movement must operate.⁶ However, the leverage gained by these unions subsequent to the passage of the legislation may make it difficult, if not impossible, for such legislation to be repealed. The legislation, which was born out of a desire to control the black labor force, has proven to be a springboard from which the black unions potentially gain even greater power.

This Courtroom, while concentrating primarily upon the legal development of black unions through recent legislation, will place this movement in the larger context of the overall South African labor environment. Specifically, this Courtroom will first present an overview of the history of black labor in this century.
