

Jean Baudrillard

Jean Baudrillard, the French philosopher and theorist known most for his work on the modes of mediation and technological communication. His work has influence of postmodernism which was a movement in the late 20th century that had massive effects on the arts and architecture revolving around the belief that the world is somewhat incomplete and there is no way to solve this or to fill the missing pieces. In philosophy many philosophers were convinced that reality with a motive behind it just didn't exist.

Baudrillard's treatise of simulation in the society in which we live, is made up of symbolism and signs that relate to something that already exists. This is often seen in films, images and the media. Simulacra isn't the resolve of reality nor the impression of resolve, however that reality has no relevance to how we understand or look at our lives. It is also considered that there is no truth and the simulacrum is thought to be what hides the fact that there isn't one.

In the 1999 film of "The matrix", Neo the main character is given a choice between a red and blue pill. The blue pill allows him to remain in this fake reality world and the red pill allows him to escape the fake reality and go into the real world.

However in relation to Baudrillard's treatise, the symbolism in of the two worlds suggests that society has constructed this idea that we can somehow fix all the problems in the world by thinking up a fantasy world and not accepting the harsh reality of life.
