Origin of life

Random inorganic chemical reactions led to the formation of molecules able to reproduce themselves and create larger molecules. Life arose around 3.8 billion years. For 2 billion years all organisms were unicellular prokaryotes. About 2.5 billion years ago, some prokaryotes acquired the ability to photosynthesize. As oxygen concentration rose in the atmosphere, aerobic metabolism was made possible. About 1.5 billion years ago, some cells had surviving smaller cells within them. These were early eukaryotic cells.

1 billion years ago Two developments made multicellular evolution possible:

- The ability of a cell to change its structure and function to meet the challenges of a changing environment.
- The ability of cells to stick together after they have divided, and act in a coordinated manner.

Oxygen concentration rising lead to ozone accumulation in the upper atmosphere. 800 million years ago, ozone shield allowed movement of organisms to land.
