Abstract Critical thinking skills are referred to as one of the 21st-century skills. These skills should be empowered through Biology learning. This study aims to analyze the improvement of biology-critical thinking skills in students who are taught through the CIRC learning model based on the scientific approach (Cirsas). Critical thinking skills are measured by tests developed by researchers and validated by theoretical biologists. The instrument includes indicators of critical thinking skills such as formulating problems, giving arguments, making deductions, conducting inductions, conducting evaluations, and deciding and implementing. This study used a quasi-experimental method with a pretest-posttest non-equivalent control group design. This study involved 160 students (M = 95, F = 65) of 8th grade of a Madrasah Tsanawiyah School in Bogor. The findings of this study show that students who are taught by Cirsas have higher Biology-critical thinking skills than those by conventional learning. In conclusion, Cirsas learning was recommended to develop or enhance students' critical thinking skills related to biological concepts.

1. Introduction

Biology education, especially in anatomy and physiology learning, is essential in developing scientific knowledge among students [1,2]. Anatomy and physiology are knowledge related to constituent organs and their function for an organism, including the work mechanism process [3,4]. Excretion and respiratory system learned at secondary school level refers to human physiology science [3,5,6]. The 2013 Curriculum applied in Indonesia includes topics on constituent organs and their functions, work mechanism, and disruptions occurred in an organism

[7–10].

Studying biology should not merely focus on knowledge related to the curriculum components. However, it should be able to empower a variety of thinking skills required by learners [11,12]. As human beings living in the 21st century, learners must be equipped with four skills, namely collaboration, communication, creative thinking, and critical thinking [7,13–15]. The research focuses on critical thinking skill empowerment. Various studies that empower critical thinking skills in Biology learning include [12,16–19]. It is proof that critical thinking skills are empowered through Biology learning.

Students with excellent critical thinking skills are more sensitive to social, scientific, and practical problems [20,21]. Critical thinking could also assist in determining careful assessment in decision making and solving daily-life biology problems [19,22]. Critical thinking implementation in Biology learning provides an opportunity to develop analytic, inductive, and deductive thinking skills to solve fundamental event-related problems [21,23].

Students with good critical thinking skills in a learning environment could provide favorable implications in terms of cultivating an attitude of self-confidence by considering self as a person who can give benefits by becoming an active contributor in the learning process [24,25]. Critical thinking skills in Biology learning could be developed through cooperative learning [16,26] emphasizing on reading activities [7,21] and scientific approach-oriented activities [20,23,27]. Scientific approach gives opportunity to students to discuss with others to make analysis of the natural phenomena and try to evaluate and solve problem, so this can improve critical thinking [13,14].

The scientific approach is recommended in the 2013 Curriculum in Indonesia [7,28,29]. Indonesian educational process standard states that learning is conducted by selecting a scientific approach adjusted to competence characteristics and level of education. Several activities in the scientific approach include observing, asking, trying,
