is less competition with water vapor for adsorption sites on the carbon. The BRS OTS fan pulls the vapors through this treatment process and delivers it to the BRS OTS stack, from which it is vented to the atmosphere.

ACTIVATED CARBON ADSORPTION

Uses of Carbon

Granular activated carbon removes organic contaminants from the pH-adjusted distillate before it is recycled to the plant for reuse in various processes, such as agent hydrolysis, biological treatment, cooling towers, and the reverse osmosis feed for preparing water for boiler feed. As noted above, granular activated carbon is also used to remove organic contaminants in the BRS-OTS that treats the gaseous effluent from the deaerator, evaporator, and crystallizer.

Distillate Carbon Filters

Two 7-foot-diameter filters in series will be used to remove organic compounds from the combined distillate. The filters normally will be operated in lead-lag fashion; that is, the system will be operated for a specified run time or until the control compound(s) or parameter (e.g., TOC) appears at a concentration higher than the treatment objective in the effluent of the second (lag) column in series. At that time, the carbon in the first (lead) filter is replaced with new carbon and this filter is then moved to the second (lag) position. Operation will be resumed until the effluent concentration from the lag column is again too high, and then the carbon replacement process is repeated.

The advantage of lead-lag operation comes from operation of the system until the target compound(s) appears in the effluent of the second column. If it were operated only until the target compound appears in the first column effluent, there would be no advantage to having two columns in series. Operating until the target compound appears in the effluent of the second column allows the carbon in the first column to be more fully utilized before it is replaced, and thus yields a lower carbon-usage rate to achieve the desired removal.

ISSUES RELATED TO THE WATER FLOW STREAM

The distillate carbon filters are the last line of defense controlling the quality of water to meet drinking water standards. If contaminants are not removed to the desired extent, or if the filters require excessive backwashing because of high suspended-solids concentration in the feedwater, the filters will fail. The composition of the combined distillate that is expected to enter the distillate carbon filters is given in Table 3-2.<sup>3</sup> This flow is made up of cooled distillate from the evaporator and condenser and the condensate from the BRS vent condenser. It is noted from Table 3-2 that the combined distillate contains 15 lbs/hr (230 ppm) of TOC and no suspended solids. The 15 lbs/hr is made up of 9.7 lbs/hr from the crystallizer and 5.3 lbs/hr from the evaporator. The origin of these numbers is not clear to the committee. It is the committee's understanding that the design of the carbon filters was based on the 15 lbs/hr TOC mass flow rate, but since composition and adsorbability of the TOC is not known, the committee does not know how long the carbon filters can be operated before carbon replacement is needed. The concentration of specific compounds of interest (target compounds) with respect to meeting drinking water standards and the concentration of adsorbable compounds that interfere with
