

Background

Schools play a key role in providing safe, nurturing learning environments that provide the foundation for learners to grow, learn and become healthy, educated and engaged citizens.

What is a health-promoting school?

Health-promoting schools (HPS) are schools with strengthened capacity to be healthy settings for living, learning and working. HPS reflect a whole-school approach, comprising healthy school policies, curricula, environments, communities and health services. A comprehensive school health programme aims to make every school a health-promoting school, which can be achieved by building health-promoting educational systems. A health-promoting education system is one that, through intentional, planned actions, institutionalises health promotion in all its functions, i.e. governance of the educational process and its content, resource allocation, educator professional development, information systems, and performance management.

What is new?

Although the concept of HPS was introduced by WHO many decades ago, the aspiration of fully embedded, sustainable HPS within educational systems is yet to be achieved. Two countries have implemented pilot at scale, to fulfil the vision of making every school a health-promoting school. United Nations agencies collaborated on developing global standards for HPS and systems implementation guidance and case studies from low- and middle-income countries. These evidence-informed resources are intended to be used by national education, health and associated sectors to strengthen their school health programmes in order to build health-promoting education systems.

TOPIC BRIEF Nutrition

Why is nutrition important for learners' health and well-being?

Access to healthy, safe, and nutritious food is essential for child and adolescent growth, neurocognitive development, disease prevention and lifelong health. Access to healthy food is a fundamental human right, a Sustainable Development Goal, and a key determinant of socio-emotional well-being. In contrast, poor diets are the main risk factor for the global burden of disease and contribute to a triple burden of malnutrition – underweight, micronutrient deficiencies and overweight – that threatens children's growth and development.

Why are nutrition and healthy diets important for education and learning?

Schooling does not automatically result in learning. The global learning crisis is due not only to inadequate investment in teachers and school infrastructure but also to lack of attention to the well-being of children and adolescents. Children who are hungry, malnourished or sick cannot take full advantage of learning opportunities. Investing in school health and nutrition is therefore part of the solution to the learning crisis.
