Other health-care specialists, however, would not say that the 1997 law, which gave insurers a "duty to defend" their policyholders, had any effect on the availability of health insurance. "The law was not intended to change the way insurers do business," says Robert A. Lurie, executive vice president of the American Insurance Association. "It was intended to make sure that insurers were not able to deny coverage to policyholders who had no other way to get coverage." Lurie says that the law was intended to make sure that insurers were not able to deny coverage to policyholders who had no other way to get coverage.
