Abstract—The Australian component of UK foreign policy in the context of the changing world order is outlined. It is highlighted that, in a value and ideological sense and due to the common Anglo-Saxon identity, London assigns Canberra a key role in the coalition of like-minded countries ("network of liberty"); in geostrategic terms, it perceives Australia as a platform to expand the UK influence in the Indo-Pacific. At present, the "special" partnership between the two countries is underpinned by a number of new agreements, including a "historical" trade deal aimed at strengthening economic ties and in-depth political, diplomatic, and defense cooperation, based on a new military alliance, AUKUS. At the same time, the traditional pragmatism inherent in the foreign policy of Australia, which positions itself as a reliable international actor, is being replaced by increasing military–political and economic dependence, which plays into the hands of London. Coming closer with Australia also allows Britain to present itself as the key extraregional player in the system of anti-Chinese alliances in the Indo-Pacific, with Washington and Canberra in the forefront.

INTRODUCTION

After Brexit, London is actively restoring alliances that have weakened for various reasons and is counting on rapprochement with traditional partners through political, defense, and economic agreements, as well as value systems aimed at preserving the liberal world order. This implies strengthening bilateral dialogue with like-minded countries, "connecting" allies to the international agenda that meets British foreign policy interests, and concluding new trade agreements [Britain after Brexit, 2021, pp. 13–34; Portanskii, 2020], as well as military–political partnerships in the Euro-Atlantic and Indo-Pacific in accordance with the new national security strategy [Anan'eva and Godovanyuk, 2021].

London builds situational alliances with individual countries (Turkey) and considers the states of Northern and Eastern Europe primarily as allies in the geopolitical confrontation with Russia; as for India and Brazil, it evaluates ties with them proceeding from its long-term geostrategic and geoeconomic interests. Australia stands out in the modern system of Britain's alliances; partnership with it is determined by a complex of historical, economic, political, military, and strategic interests, based on a common identity and assessment of threats to the modern world order.

PREREQUISITES FOR PARTNERSHIP: COMMON IDENTITY AND FOREIGN POLICY TRADITIONS

In intellectual discussions, Brexit has brought to the fore questions of identity, reflecting myths about the confrontation between the "Anglo-Saxon" and "European" nature of British foreign policy [Vucetic, 2022].

The debate continues on whether special attention to the "Anglosphere"¹ was an inevitable consequence of leaving the European Union or its cause, as the Brexiters claimed. The opinions of experts concerning what should be viewed as the Anglosphere vary. It was perceived either as a reference to Britain's imperial past [Hill, 2019] or as a synonym for the Five Eyes (United States, Britain, Australia, Canada, and New Zealand) intelligence alliance. Some foreign studies view the community of English-speaking countries as a conditional geopolitical actor, the weight of which in world politics has increased owing to Brexit [Peters, 2021]. This mindset began to dominate in the strategic planning of the United Kingdom against the backdrop of the discourse about distancing itself from the European Union and strengthening Atlanticism and its interpretation in the Eastern Hemisphere—promoting
