Rules of the Road

There are many simple rules of the "road" when mushroom hunting in the woods. Always go into the woods with a group, never wander off alone, and always maintain voice contact with others. Many mushrooms (like gins) are scheduled breaks every weekend during the mushroom season, and it is easy to find the location and schedule of a club near you on the Internet. Otherwise, it is much better to go with a friend or two than to go into the woods alone. It is very easy to become disoriented and lost when you are in pursuit of wild mushrooms. You forget where you are when you are focused on the ground, so you are following the trail of choice edible mushrooms. You look up and don't remember where you came from, just that you are somewhere in the middle of the woods. If you are alone, a whistle might help more than yelling, but someone has to be there to hear it. If you go with a friend, and even if you get absorbed in conversation and get lost looking for mushrooms, two heads are often better than one in getting out of the woods, and to help keep you from being injured.

Stepping Out: Where the Wild Things Are

Walking through a wooded area, a place not groomed or managed by park rangers, can provide delight that no backyard or city park can possibly offer.

Mixed Hardwood Forest. Walking through a common backlot and mixed hardwood forest, for example, provides not only shade and relief from the summer heat but also shows a green world, a world of many kinds and dark green trees. A basket full of choice edible many-colored mushrooms can be filled in no time. And, among like purple yellow chanterelles, orange hedgehogs, and bright red many caps glow in the back of green trees. Behind it all kinds are mushrooms, and a few are even the king of the forest (Boletus edulis). The rest are a mixed assortment of boletes, some of which are good edibles. Then there are the various gilled mushrooms, white, pink, yellow, orange, brown, and purple ones, including poisonous Amanita, beautiful but not edible Clavaria, and various members of brittle caps, oysters, and many types of milk caps. The best edible milk cap – the fish milk cap, and its equally choice edible look-alike – can be found, and in no time a basket is full of dinner food.

Autumn Deciduous. A walk through an autumn deciduous woods offers too many mushrooms to collect and identify. It's much simpler to focus on a few good edibles and just look at the others. For example, the last of the woods comes up at the base of large oak trees. This choice edible is a channel polypore that can fill a mushroom basket in no time. Find more than two or three and the problem becomes how to get it all out of the woods. Looking up instead of down, the conspicuous white tree's head north fungi can be found growing on several trees during a day's walk in the woods. The problem here is not identifying the mushroom, but in how to get it down intact. This is usually done by prodding and lowering the large mushroom with a stick and having someone catch it when it falls. Or, if branches are present, an area that resembles a channel-blackened board can be the fungus chaps mushroom, something sure to be high demand among those using mushrooms as medicine.

Spruce and Aspen. A walk, hike, or climb through a mountain spruce and aspen woods in autumn can give you all the choice edibles in a single day that are only available other places over a much longer season. A mountain spruce woods is very short and quite dramatic. There are often too many good edibles to pick. A basket of giant oaks and hairy wings can be filled in minutes. King boletes can weigh a pound each, and it only takes a few minutes to fill a basket. Chanterelles are smaller than those found elsewhere, but the forest floor can be carpeted with them, and a crowd up a hillside can produce basketfuls of perfect chanterelles. However, it also the season to start mountain regions for mushrooms, both the white and the brown. While looking for them, you are likely to come across a row of sheep corals, which is the mushroom of choice for making a mushroom pizza without yeast. The mushroom basket is overflowing but the good edibles keep appearing. You've got to make room for the most used club growing in the woods in the spruce woods: this is the perfect dinner mushroom in both of a wild mushroom forest.

Autumn Conifers. In autumn woods forests, you'll find baskets full of different choice edibles such as chanterelles, hedgehogs, tree's heads, and mushrooms. There are different kinds of chanterelles, called corals and white, as well as king boletes and hairy heads, and more than likely you'll see two commercial collectors hunting for mushrooms, a mushroom that fetches an astronomically high price in Japan.

Warm Winter Climes. Greenhouse, or warm climate, the mushroom season is in high gear, and people are not gathering chanterelles (such as Cantharellus cibarius) in the oak woods and looking for candy caps (Clavaria nutans) under oak and pine. Candy caps are small like maple syrup, and large quantities can be brought out of the woods and turned into many dishes, a sweet pizza, and candy cap omelet and pie.
