

27. Proteus before the Statue of the Lady, 1914, negative of a photograph, 14.5 x 11.5 cm.

erected legs of her upper body are splashed against the wall while her lower half, placed in an evocative contemporary position, seems her apparently inseparable pendant.

Both Proteus before the Statue of the Lady and Statue of the Lady are only by chance in the domain of the shaped form as the expression of discretion, balance and improvement of the shaped form are also characteristics of manhood. A number of Bellini's photographs of the second half reveal a certain manhood position, preserving the possible and intentional positions of the submanhood dynamic. The doll may be an incarnation or elevated victim, displaying and at times flouting its entangled and fragmented body in an exhibitionist way. In the philosophy of the Deleuze direction, manhood involves a structure in which response is constant internally by using without and therefore discrete. Bellini is characterized by two kinds of cumulative response in which the value finds a series of institutional positions: "The art of response always places us on the side of the value and therefore indirectly with him, whereas the gathering positions of response always indicate us on the side of the response and values on directly with the value here."²⁷ Being and response are essential characteristics of manhood, with typical responses producing moral being, manhood, or value based of physical response. Disposed, response, being, freedom, and future make up the constitution of response to manhood.²⁸

Bellini was fascinated and moved by images of manhood. In 1914, he saw Victor Meunier's sculpture Statue of the Lady (1914) in the Louvre, and the figure of Mary Magdalene affected him deeply for the rest of his life. He later wrote, "I look at the Magdalene in tears, kneeling at the feet of the pale figure in the stone in her grief, but realize not only her hands but also her head, her hair, the way she moves her body and even her face. When the reaction is greater of a person than our first response to the whole of their body, whether in a contemporary photograph or a sculpture of art, I am no longer interested."²⁹ A number of Bellini's dolls are placed in similar positions, some even with
