BRITANNICA'S TYPESETTERS

Women Compositors in Edwardian Edinburgh

The printing trade has traditionally reserved its skilled jobs for men—but for over thirty years in Edinburgh women were being actively recruited to work as compositors and were even responsible for the typesetting of the eleventh edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Using printing office records, trade union papers, contemporary press and journal articles, as well as the first hand evidence from compositors still living, Siân Reynolds tells the story of women's entry into the printing trade. She analyses the reactions of the men they worked with, examines the attitudes of trade unions, and looks closely at why recruitment came to a sudden end in 1910.

With its rich portrait of a whole generation of working women in Edinburgh and its relevance to current debates about men and women's work, this is a book which will find a place on the bookshelves of both the academic and the general reader.

Siân Reynolds is Senior Lecturer in French and History at the University of Sussex.
