

The Black Drink: A Southeastern Native Tea

The leaves of this shrubby or woody plant, which grows in the Southeast, are used to make the black drink. The leaves are dried and then ground before being used to make the black drink.

Casina, commonly called black drink, was a dark brew loaded with caffeine. It was popular with Spaniards and Apalachee alike.

Black drink could only be served in the council house unless the chief granted special permission to serve it elsewhere.

One friar was allegedly experiencing casina-nerve or caffeine withdrawal when he stormed into the council house and broke some pottery jars because he was not given his black drink on time.

PIP BENTURA

As casita, or town manager, Pip Bentura was responsible for overseeing the preparation of the black drink. He was also in charge of native relations and supervised the planting of the San Luis fields.
