

ANIMALS PHYSIOLOGY

The internal organs of most reptiles include a three-chambered heart with two atria and one partially divided ventricle.

- 1 When a bird eats, food moves down the esophagus and is stored in the crop.
- 2 Moistened food passes to the stomach, a two-part chamber. The first chamber secretes acid and enzymes. The partially digested food moves to the second chamber, the gizzard.
- 3 The muscular walls of the gizzard squeeze the contents, while small stones grind the food.
- 4 As digestion continues, the food moves through the intestines.
- 5 Undigested food is expelled through the cloaca.

All mammals, including this brown bear, have a four-chambered heart that pumps blood in two separate circuits around the body.

The specialized jaws and teeth of mammals are adapted for different diets. Carnivorous mammals use sharp canines and incisors to grip and slice flesh from their prey. Their jaws usually move up and down as they chew. Herbivorous mammals use flat-edged incisors to grasp and tear vegetation, and flattened molars to grind the food. Their jaws generally move from side to side. Researchers often use tooth shape and structure to classify mammals.

Diggers
Digging mammals have strong, short skulls and powerful front paws that are adapted for moving earth.

Fliers
The arms and hands of bats are modified into wings that allow them to fly.

Swimmers
Swimming mammals have long, flexible tails and flippers that are adapted for moving through water.

Climbers
Climbing mammals have long, flexible limbs and sharp claws that are adapted for gripping surfaces. They also have a flexible wrist joint.

Runners
Running mammals have long limbs that are adapted for moving quickly. They also have a flexible wrist joint.

Jumpers
Jumping mammals have long, powerful hind legs that are adapted for leaping. They also have a flexible wrist joint.
