

This rear overhead view of an early 520i shows very clearly how resolved the overall body shape was. Also apparent here are the 'Hofmeister kink' at the trailing edge of the rear door window and the two separate elements of the rear lights, which always lined up perfectly when the car was new.

electronic wheelspin control system, and TRX wheels with wider tyres. The self-levelling system would maintain the ride height even if the rear of the car was heavily laden, so that handling remained unaffected. The adjustable dampers, which had filtered down from the 7 Series cars, were fitted to the rear suspension in place of the standard twin-tube gas dampers that were otherwise standard at all four corners. They were made by Fichtel & Sachs and were adjusted electronically by a switch on the dashboard that offered Comfort (soft) and Sports (hard) settings; the actual adjustment was achieved by rotary valves within the damper tubes.

As for the wheelspin control system, BMW called it ASC, which stood for Automatic Stability Control. It depended on the wheel sensors of the ABS system and would momentarily pulse the brake on a spinning wheel to enable it to regain traction. ASC was standard only on the top model 535i when the E28 range was launched in 1988, but it would later spread right across the BMW range because it offered such valuable safety benefits.

The TRX wheels and tyres proved to be less of a success, however. TRX – 'TR' for tension répartie, or distributed tension, and 'X' for the brand that dated back to the days of Michelin's early radial tyre – was a system that had been introduced by the tyre company back in 1975. Promising improved directional stability, especially at the upper limits, it was based on a tyre that was constructed in such a way as to permit a more even distribution of stresses across the whole of the casing. To support the new type of construction, the wheel rim was also fundamentally changed, with a flatter and lower flange. The differences from standard
