

What do you do when a student with disabilities acts out in class, uses profane language, leaves school, or strikes another student? This knotty question is one that educators are facing every day; and they don't have to face it alone. Functional behavioral assessment (FBA) can help (see box, "What Does the Literature Say?").

This article provides guidance in providing appropriate responses and solutions for such situations. The responses involve ways to find out what is prompting the student to misbehave, what consequences have not worked, and what solutions teams of educators and parents might find.

Developing the FBA Guide

The U.S. Department of Education's Office of Special Education Programs (OSEP) released the final regulations for IDEA 1997 in March 1999. At this time, a development team of four teachers certified in the area of emotional/behavioral disorders (E/BD) and their special education supervisor (the first author of this article) met to discuss how to assist teachers in their district in completing the FBA process. After several preliminary meetings to review the law and the research on best practices in the FBA process, the team developed the guide that is illustrated in this article and then provided training on use of the guide for teachers in their district.

In one 3-hour session, the team initially trained more than 300 special education teachers in their district to use the guide. Follow-up sessions were offered for clarification and feedback. The team offered 2-hour retraining sessions each semester during the first year of implementation. In addition, individuals from the team of developers attended FBA meetings at district schools at the request of the school administrators. Over a 3-year period, the team revised the guide, based on feedback from teachers in their district who had used it. Most of the feedback from the teachers pertained to the layout of the form. That is, teachers requested more room to write. The Appendix to this article provides a copy of the FBA guide. To illustrate the use of the guide, we provide the following case study.

Sammy: A Case Study

We have provided specific descriptions and a case study to help other teachers "walk" through the FBA process (see box, "Sammy"). Figures 1-6 provide detailed illustrations of each section of the FBA, and the following sections explain the uses of various parts of the guide.

A Practical Guide to Functional Behavioral Assessment

Margaret E. Shippen • Robert G. Simpson • Steven A. Crites

Each member of Sammy's team was given the FBA guide and agreed to collect data. The individualized education program (IEP) team scheduled a meeting in 3 weeks to complete the functional assessment. The following is a review of how the team used the guide both in data collection and in completion of the FBA for Sammy. We have divided each page of the guide into sections for clearer explanation.

Demographic Information

The first section of the FBA guide contained information about Sammy, his school, and the dates of the assessment process (see Figure 1). In this case, the date of assessment was the initial meeting date. The submitting teacher was Sammy's special education teacher because she was his "teacher of record." The dates to begin and review the behavioral intervention plan (BIP) were not completed because, at this stage of the process, the team was only
