Advanced Computers Parallel And Biochip Processors:

Advanced Computers Norman W. Lord, 1983 High Performance Parallel Computers for Science, 1988 Fermilab
The Advanced Computer Program ACP has been developing highly cost effective yet practical parallel computers for high energy physics since 1984. The ACP's latest developments are proceeding in two directions. A Second Generation ACP Multiprocessor System for experiments will include 3500 RISC processors each with performance over 15 VAX MIPS. To support such high performance, the new system allows parallel I/O, parallel interprocess communication, and parallel host processes. The ACP Multi Array Processor has been developed for theoretical physics. Each 4000 node is a FORTRAN or C programmable pipelined 20 MFlops peak, 10 MByte single board computer. These are plugged into a 16 port crossbar switch crate which handles both inter and intra crate communication. The crates are connected in a hypercube. Site oriented applications like lattice gauge theory are supported by system software called CANOPY which makes the hardware virtually transparent to users. A 256 node 5 GFlop system is under construction. 10 refs, 7 figs. Advanced Computer Architecture
