

power traditionally have been important forces in promoting similarity in provincial programmes, recent cutbacks to federal fiscal transfers will weaken Ottawa's influence and will tend to diversify the provision of various social programmes across the country. Along with this issue of federal-provincial shared programmes, the editor identifies several other issue-areas as research possibilities. These are: the equalization system, the tax collection agreements, public sector capital, federal-provincial tax competition, responsibility for schooling, public ownership, provincial stabilization and provincial pension plans. Other areas, of course, could be added. For example, the two volumes do not discuss provincial tax expenditures and their growing role over the past 20 years in economic and social policy.

Volume one is divided into 11 chapters which survey public finances in each province and in the territories. These chapters are primarily written by economists knowledgeable of the jurisdictions. While the content varies somewhat, the chapters generally present some background information, historical budget trends, the current fiscal situation including the pattern of revenues and expenditures and important issues and special features pertaining to the jurisdiction.

Volume two contains 15 chapters which address a broad range of constitutional, budgetary, economic and political topics. Irene Ip presents a thorough overview of provincial government finances, including local governments and hospitals. Robin Boadway and Frank Flatters examine federal-provincial fiscal relations and consider some consequences of recent constitutional and policy developments. In a similar but more specific vein, Keith Banting looks at the life of shared-cost programmes with and without the Meech Lake Accord. Banting concludes that even without the Accord's passage, any new shared-cost initiatives, such as in the child-care field, will have to accommodate considerable regional variation. Other strong chapters in the volume include Paul Hobson's review of local government in Canada, Thomas Courchene and Arthur Stewart on provincial personal income taxation and Bill Stanbury's analysis of provincial privatization efforts. Overall, these volumes are a significant addition to our growing understanding of public finances and the provincial state in Canada.

Pierre Hamel

Montréal : Presses de l'Université de Montréal, 1991, 236 p.

Cet ouvrage, situé dans le champ de la sociologie des mouvements sociaux, tire ses analyses d'observations faites sur la ville de Montréal entre 1960 et 1990. Il expose les enseignements de l'action collective de comités, d'associations, de groupes, d'organismes divers. C'est le rappel d'une histoire récente à partir « des principales traces laissées par les revendications et les affrontements majeurs auxquels ont participé les mouvements urbains » (12). L'auteur veut faire de ceux-ci « un acteur à part entière sur la scène politique locale » (12) en analysant le rôle qu'ils jouent dans le processus de production et de gestion de l'espace urbain. Montrer que « les villes se construisent à travers les conflits, les affrontements, les luttes » (17) mérite bien des analyses pour comprendre le jeu des décideurs, le rôle des forces en présence et la résultante que constitue le cadre de vie de milliers de citoyens aujourd'hui.

L'auteur, observateur de longue date des luttes urbaines sur la scène montréalaise, s'appuie sur des travaux de recherche effectués au fil des années pour
